THE DIVORCE EVIL.

Marriage Made a Failure by the Ease with Which It Can Be Annulled.

The frivolous character of the complaints in many cases of divorce recently granted and now on the docket leads thoughtful people to ask: "What are we coming to?" We do not know that the wives in a given number of cases are more blamable than the husbands, but it is the wives who suffer the most from such sundered relations. As a rule, they suffer more in their affections and in their reputations than the stronger sex. While there is something to be said in favor of a law of divorce which separates mis-matched couples, there is no condemnation so severe for men or women who enter the marriage state with the idea in their minds that if they do not like it they will take advantage of the law that allows them to escape. Yet there is no doubt that thoughtless young men and giddy girls often do approach the altar with that thought in their minds. In cases where the husband is very young the idea is apt to grow in strength as the years pass. He finds himself while on the sunny side of thirty with a wife who has possibly lost some of her girlish beauty; and children, whose necessities absorb the greater part of his earnings. He compares the free and independent life of some of his bachelor associates, and imagination magnifies the pleasures he might participate in if he were unmarried. Some day the wife, who is ill prepared to fight the battles of life alone, is stunned by the service of an application for divorce. Cases of this kind, we regret to say, are not uncommon. Almost every one can recall one or more in his own circle of acquaintances. Of course, if the real reasons were preferred in the application less harm would be done; but the legal necessity of setting forth reasons often suggests a resort to falsehood. Trifles in the way of disagreements will be magnified and baseless suspicions urged as matters of fact. The remedy for them, as for most other evils, lies with the people themselves. The law is not so much at fault as the facility with which it is evaded. The church and society are too lenient in matters of this kind. It may be questioned if a man divorcing a wife for no other reason than that he prefers to live single is injured in his business or social relations by his act. If he has been a church member he still remains one. And yet he has committed the most cowardly crime a man can commit. A woman thus divorced, unless she have powerful friends, has no future, and children are thrown upon the world without the character and instincts of right which are inculcated in well-regulated homes. —San Francisco Call.

CLEVERLY TAKEN IN:

How a Book-Agent Conquered a Choleric Old Gentleman.

An extremely stout, choleric old gentleman sat in his office on Friday turning over a lot of papers and swearing to himself, says the New York Sun. He was in a beastly temper, for things had gone wrong ever since morning, and now and then he cast his eyes about as if in search of something to kick as an outlet for his tempestuous state of mind.

"That book-agent is out here, sir," said a clerk, thrusting his head through the door. "Show him in," yelled the old gentleman, greedily, "and I'll kick the everlasting stuffing out of him."

A minute later a pretty little girl came demurely in, and drawing a chair up to the old gentleman's desk, smiled sweetly.

"Just excuse me a minute," said the old fellow. "There's a nasty book-agent coming."

"I am the book-agent, sir," said the little girl, and she thrust a hand away down through a hole in her dress and brought up a volume.

"Can't I sell you a copy, sir?" she said, cheerfully, rushing through the leaves. "It is only five dollars, and is profusely illustrated, and so useful that no home is complete without one. Buy a copy, please, and I shall forget that you called me nasty."

"I didn't," puffed the old gentleman, excitedly. "I swear I never said any thing of the kind. Leave the book."

Then the old man yelled: "John, give this young lady five dollars."

When the old gentleman picked up his book to carry it home he discovered that it was a collection of love songs.
